And so, there we were, covering an exhibition game in the eastern European province of Jimar Rimar—a rather extraordinary setting, I might add—when an individual from a local church approached the team chaplain and delivered a coded message. Now, the pitcher knew the key. It is, quite conveniently, displayed below. But circumstances intervened, as they so often do in the world of sport, and our broadcast team was compelled to depart for the next engagement. And that, ladies and gentlemen, is where you enter the picture.

Your assignment is quite clear: decode the message and convey the results to your church league softball captain. But before you attempt this admittedly intriguing exercise, examine the sample entitled "Hello World." It will demonstrate precisely how the system operates. The challenge has been presented. The information is in your hands. What you do with it... is up to you.
